The seedlings revenge

One fine morning a vegetable garden is discovered beside a major intersection in the middle of the city.

A patch of salad garden on the pavement, a row of onions beside the traffic lights, a field of cabbages in front of a statue.

People are amazed and believe the whole thing to be a joke, but the next day matters become more confused, the installation has grown: rows of vegetables, vines, a scarecrow, a manure heap, gardeners, smells – the whole thing has engulfed the pavement, bus shelters and the median strip.

So, for three days a new order is established according to its own rules and this peaceful chaos spreads throughout the well-organised road system.

Doubts arise. Is this a trap, someone's or something's revenge? Will the intersection be submerged. At this point of confusion the resolution is brutally sudden: on the morning of the 5th day every thing will have disappeared, an overnight removal.

But the nagging doubts persist. Was it a dream? An omen?
